A Painter's Winter

- Hoping that October lasts until April.
 - Convinced that November's interior workload is a true indication that the next 4 months won't be that bad.
 - Remembering in our own minds that it's 70° in March.
 - Completely forgetting that there really is a month of February.
 - Counting weeks down to go until April.
 - Hoping that all your good customers will remember you and have their interior painted.
 - Wishing that all top employees love their jobs so much that lost time won't scare them into pursuing other employment options.
 - Trying to remember if you really did like snow as a child.
 - Watching the bills pile up.
 - Putting off once more that great ski trip you planned all summer.
 - Daydreaming about overtime as you try to recall which rerun of "I Love Lucy" you just sat through.
 - Sharing stories with co-workers of how hot July is.
 - Going through notes thinking somewhere there's a note from a customer that said "Call me when you're slow."
 - Wishing Christmas was in June.
 - Thinking that 2 busy weeks in February will follow through till May.
 - Hoping that roofers, deck builders, landscapers, and everyone else stays busy so that they don't once again become professional painters.
 - Convinced that the groundhog know what he's doing. (Thinking the groundhog thing is a joke.)
 - Spending too much time looking for that first robin.
 - Just shaking your head to that March blizzard forecast.
 - Looking for the crocus to bloom.
 - Never missing a live drawing.
 - Hoping your company beats out the other 10 bids for that bathroom ceiling job.
 - Wondering if April is ever going to come...
- But, then it does, and you think back over the not-so-bad winter and November seems years away.
